

A WRITTEN VERSION OF THE CLASS

THE BEAUTY OF HUMAN DESIRE

*Understanding Ourselves
Through the Eyes of the Torah*

RAV YISRAEL FRENKEL

YISRAEL FRENKEL

Why our deepest desires are not our enemy

Rav · Educator · Therapist · Twenty years of listening

YISRAELFRENKEL.COM

Yisrael@YisraelFrenkel.com · WhatsApp +972 58-761-3153

The Question

There is a question that has fascinated me for more than twenty years.

Why do genuinely good people keep reaching for things they themselves believe are wrong?

Why do sincere people — people who love Hashem, people who genuinely want to live beautiful lives — so often find themselves doing things they themselves wish they didn't do? Not once. Not twice. Sometimes for years.

That question has shaped almost my entire adult life.

My name is Rav Yisrael Frenkel. For more than twenty years I have had the privilege of listening to people tell me things they have never told another human being.

I have sat with children. With teenagers. With young adults. With single men and single women. With married couples. Some were victims of abuse. Some were struggling with pornography. Some were couples who had been struggling with intimacy for years. Some were people caught in affairs. People carrying deep shame. People who sincerely wanted to serve Hashem, and yet found themselves doing things they themselves believed were wrong.

After thousands of those conversations, I began to notice a pattern. Something that kept appearing again, and again, and again.

The people were different. Their stories were different. Their struggles looked different. But the pattern was always the same. Genuinely good people who wanted to live meaningful lives kept finding themselves reaching for things they themselves believed were wrong. And almost every one of them carried an enormous amount of shame.

But something else struck me even more deeply. Almost every one of them believed they were the only one. Everyone else had figured it out. Everyone else's mind was clean. Everyone else had self-control. Somehow, "I'm the only one." And that loneliness created even more shame.

BEFORE YOU READ ON

Have you ever wondered whether you were the only one still struggling?

When I ask that question in a room full of people, almost every person in the room answers yes. Every single time.

One of the greatest lies the yetzer tells us is that we are alone — that everyone else has moved on, and you are the only one still struggling.

Before we learn anything else, I hope we have already begun to break that illusion. Because you are not alone.

And now, together, let's begin our journey of revelation.

TWO

The Way We Try to Change

Over more than twenty years of listening to hundreds and hundreds of people, I noticed another pattern. Not only did people share the same struggle. Almost everyone who genuinely wanted to change also tried to change in almost exactly the same way.

Through fear. Through control. Through shame.

People would say, “If I hate myself enough, maybe next time I’ll stop.”

Others built fences. “I’ll delete the app.” “I’ll get filters.” “I’ll never be alone.”

Others relied on sheer willpower. “This time I’ll beat it.” “This time I’ll crush it.”

Now, all of those things have their place. I am not dismissing them. But I want to ask you another question.

A QUESTION TO SIT WITH

Have you honestly tried one or more of those approaches — and still found yourself returning to the same struggle?

Exactly. And that is where so many people lose hope.

“I’ve tried. I’ve davened. I’ve cried. I’ve made promises. I’ve built fences. And I failed again.”

Eventually, many people arrive at a heartbreaking conclusion. “There must be something wrong with me.”

And because human beings need to make sense of their experience, they begin to give themselves new names. “I’m an addict.” “I have an addiction.”

Whether those words are clinically appropriate is not my point here. My point is that for many people, those names become another layer of shame. They stop describing a struggle, and begin describing an identity. Instead of saying, “I’m a beautiful person who is struggling,” they begin saying, “This is who I am.”

For me, watching so many remarkable people — so many sincere, intelligent, deeply committed people — living this exact story, meant that we have to ask a different question.

Not “How do I control my desires?”

Because before we ask how to control something Hashem created, we first have to ask: why did Hashem create it?

Whenever we encounter something this powerful — something capable of moving us, consuming our thoughts, shaping our choices, and even changing the direction of our lives — before asking how to silence it, we first have to ask: what was it created to do?

The deepest forces that Hashem placed within the human being are too profound, too intelligent, and too powerful to be random. They have a purpose.

I sat with that question for years, in my own life, and then in listening to hundreds and hundreds of other people. And I came to realize that the Torah has the answer. What I discovered changed the way I understand the human being.

The very energy that so many people have spent years fighting is not their greatest enemy. It is one of the greatest gifts Hashem ever placed within the human soul.

The reason these desires seem stronger than your own will is because they do not come from some foreign force inside of you. They come from the deepest part of who you are. In their essence, they are the longing to become the person Hashem created you to be.

THREE

The Desire and the Decision

If that is true, then everything changes.

Because if these desires emerge from the deepest part of who we are, then trying to shame them, hate them, or simply crush them into silence can never produce lasting transformation. You cannot become whole by declaring war on the deepest energies that Hashem Himself placed within you.

But before we go any further, we have to make one distinction. A distinction that, in my experience, changes everything.

We must distinguish between the desire itself and the decisions we make about how to fulfill that desire. Those are not the same thing.

For example, I think all of us would agree that wanting self-worth, dignity and respect is something beautiful. But that doesn't mean every strategy a person chooses to achieve self-worth is a good one. Someone may spend his entire life chasing wealth, status, or a Lamborghini, believing that finally he'll feel worthy. The mistake was never the longing for worth. The mistake was confusing how to achieve it.

And the same is true here.

I am not saying every behavior is holy. I am not saying every choice is healthy. I am not saying every expression of our desires is beautiful. Some expressions are deeply destructive.

But the desire underneath them is not trying to destroy us. It is trying to lead us toward something profoundly good. We simply became confused about how to reach it.

The mistake was never the desire. The mistake was confusing how to fulfill it.

And if that's true, then our desire is no longer something to fear. It becomes something to understand.

TRY THIS NOW

Bring to mind one desire that has caused you pain.

Now, for just a moment, stop trying to get rid of it.

Instead, imagine that this desire has been trying to help you all along — even if you don't yet understand what it wants. Even if it has become terribly confused.

Just notice what happens inside of you when you look at it that way. Give it a full ten seconds before you read on.

Did you notice that nothing about the desire changed? The only thing that changed was your relationship to it.

And that is where change begins. Because once I stop seeing my desire as my enemy, I no longer have to spend all of my energy fighting it. I can begin doing something much more powerful. I can begin understanding it.

The first step toward genuine change is not fighting our deepest desires. It is understanding them. And the only way to truly understand something is to listen to it.

Not listening in order to justify every behavior. Not listening in order to excuse every action. But listening with one question:

| What has this desire been trying to accomplish all along?

Every desire is reaching for something. Every desire is trying to move us toward something. And if we listen deeply enough — beneath the confusion, beneath the shame, beneath even destructive behavior — we discover something extraordinarily beautiful.

I want to invite you on that journey. I want to invite you to go deeply inside yourself and discover how profoundly beautiful you really are.

FOUR

First, We Listen to the Torah

But before we begin listening to ourselves, we first need to listen to the Torah.

Because from my experience, the Torah doesn't distract us from hearing ourselves. It teaches us how to hear ourselves. It gives words to things our souls have always known but never knew how to express.

I think many of us have misunderstood what the Torah is trying to do. Many people imagine that the purpose of Torah is to make us become something we are not. Almost as if the Torah is saying, "You are empty. You are broken. Now let me teach you how to become holy."

But I don't believe that is the way the Torah sees the human being.

The Torah compares itself to water. Think about that for a moment. If I pour water onto a rock, nothing grows. If I pour water onto a table, nothing grows. Water doesn't create life. Water reveals life that is already there.

A seed already contains within it the entire potential of the tree. The DNA, the branches, the fruit — everything. The water doesn't place those things inside the seed. It awakens them. It gives them the ability to emerge.

Torah works the same way. Hashem didn't only create a holy Torah. He also created a holy soul. Our souls already carry within them the deepest potential for goodness, for love, for truth, for holiness. Torah doesn't place those things inside us. Torah awakens them. It reminds us who we already are.

Which means that as you read what follows, I want you to listen to something much deeper than the words. Listen to yourself resonating with the words of the Torah. Listen for those quiet moments when something inside of you says, “Yes. I've always known that. I just never had the words.”

We are not going to learn something new. Together, we are simply going to uncover something your soul already knew.

And that is why learning Torah and listening to ourselves are not two different activities. They are the very same journey. The Torah gives language to truths that have always lived within the soul.

A QUESTION TO SIT WITH

As you have been reading so far, has there been even one moment where something inside of you quietly said, “I've never thought about it that way — but it feels true”?

Good. That is exactly what I hoped would happen. Because my goal here isn't simply to give you information. It's to help you recognize something your soul has been trying to tell you all along.

So before we go inward and discover the core of our desires, let's listen to the Torah, and let it help us understand what we are hearing. Let's allow the Torah to remind us who we really are.

Because to really understand the things a human being desires, we must first understand what the essence of a human being actually is.

REVELATION ONE

בצלם אלוקים — In His Image

And that brings us to one of the most profound ideas in all of Torah.

נַעֲשֶׂה אָדָם בְּצַלְמֵנוּ כְּדִמוּתֵנוּ

"Let us make man in Our image, according to Our likeness."

Every human being was created בְּצַלְם אֱלֹהִים.

This isn't simply a beautiful idea. It is the foundation of what it means to be human. Being created b'Tzelem Elokim means that Hashem designed the human being to express and reveal His attributes through the flesh and blood that we all are.

Stop for a second and realize how profound that statement is.

Our minds. Our emotions. Our physical bodies. Our desires. Our relationships. Every essential part of who we are was intentionally designed as a way for us to be God-like.

Every essential part of my design is exactly the way it is because it is the best possible way to express one of Hashem's attributes through a human life.

And that means:

Every essential part of my humanity, at its core, is good.

Every essential desire, at its core, is holy.

Every essential desire, at its core, is beautiful.

REVELATION TWO

The Greatest Gift

If my purpose is to express Hashem's attributes, then before I can understand myself, I first have to understand Him. So the next question becomes: Who is Hashem?

The Ramchal teaches that Hashem created the world because He desired להיטיב לברואיו — to bestow good upon His creations.

But what is the greatest good that Hashem could possibly give?

Many people imagine the answer is unlimited wealth, perfect health, every physical pleasure, or even an eternal paradise where every desire is fulfilled.

The Ramchal says something even more astonishing.

Hashem certainly wanted us to experience all that is good, all that is beautiful, and every genuine pleasure. But those pleasures are not isolated things. Each one is a tiny expression — a single ray, refracted from one infinite Source. The pleasure we find in beauty, in love, in understanding, in holiness: all of it comes from Him.

And if even one ray can bring us such delight, then the Source of every ray must be the greatest delight imaginable.

Hashem wanted to give us not merely His gifts, but Himself.

And what does it mean to receive Him? It means to experience Him. To delight in the infinite Source of every genuine delight.

We have all tasted a faint משל of this. There are moments when we encounter something so beautiful, so vast, so far beyond us, that simply beholding it fills us with joy.

TRY THIS NOW

Think of one moment in your life when you felt overwhelmed by beauty. You don't need to tell the story. Just one moment.

In moments like those, the soul delights simply by encountering something greater than itself. That is only a משל — a tiny glimpse of what it means to receive joy not from possessing something, but from encountering a reality beyond yourself.

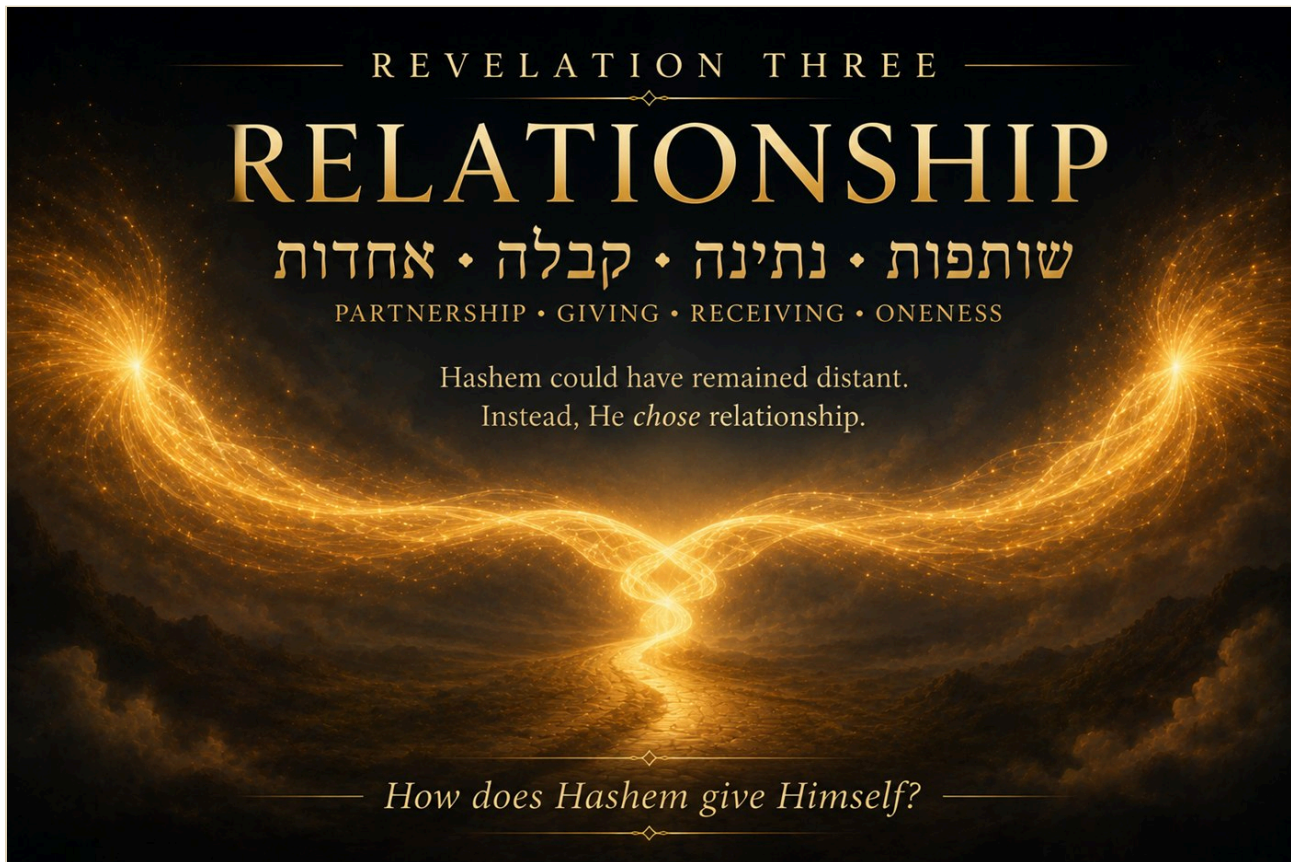

Now imagine not one finite beauty, but an experience containing every genuine delight a human being is capable of knowing: every physical delight, every emotional delight, every intellectual delight, every spiritual delight — not as separate pleasures, but united in one infinite experience.

Because you are no longer experiencing the rays. You are experiencing the Source from which every one of them flows, without limit and without end.

That is what Chazal mean when they say נִהְיִים מְזִיו הַשְּׂכִינָה. That is what the Ramchal means when he says לְהִתְעַנֵּג עַל ה'.

REVELATION THREE

Relationship

If Hashem's greatest desire was to give us Himself, then one question remains. How?

How can an infinite God give Himself to a finite human being?

He could have created a universe where He remained distant. He could have simply created us, given us a book of laws, rewarded us when we obeyed, punished us when we didn't, and remained forever beyond us.

But that's not the world He created. Instead, He wove Himself into every part of our lives.

He shares His wisdom with us through His Torah. He shares His vision for the world with us. He shares His deepest values with us. He invites us to become partners in His creation.

When we bring justice into the world, we become partners in His justice. When we show compassion, we become partners in His compassion. When parents bring children into the world, they become partners with Him in creating life. When we build, teach, heal, forgive, or help another human being grow, we are not merely doing good deeds. We are participating in His own work.

And He asks something remarkable in return. Not only our obedience. He asks for our hearts. Our hopes. Our fears. Our gratitude. Our questions. Our love. He wants us to bring our whole selves into the relationship.

The Creator of the universe didn't create servants who simply carry out commands. He created partners. He created a relationship where His life is shared with us, and our lives are shared with Him.

Now we can finally understand the human being.

We are created בְּצֶלֶם אֱלֹהִים.

If Hashem's deepest desire is to give, then we have a deep need to give. If Hashem desires relationship — to become deeply connected with us, to weave Himself into our lives — then we too were created with a deep need to become intertwined with the lives of others. If Hashem wants to give Himself over and to be received, then we too long to give ourselves over, and to be truly received.

This is not an accident. This is what it means to be created in His image.

Now ask yourself: what brings a human being the greatest joy? And what brings a human being the deepest pain?

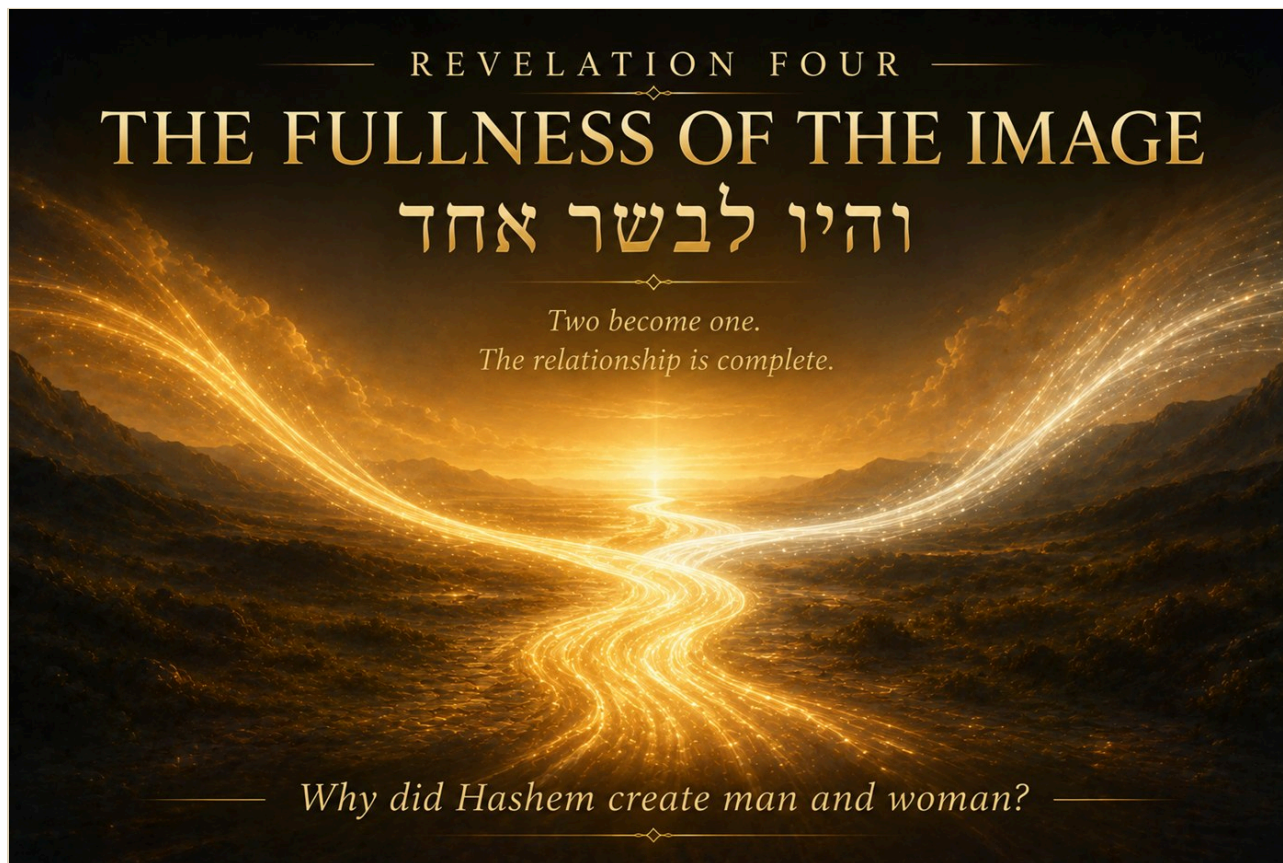

A child doesn't simply need food. A child needs parents who are deeply involved in his life. Parents don't simply raise children. They long for their children to become part of their lives. The deepest friendships bring the deepest joy. The deepest betrayals bring the deepest pain. The closer someone is to us, the greater our capacity for pleasure — and the greater our capacity for hurt.

Why? Because relationship isn't one need among many. It is one of the deepest structures of who we are. We were created to share ourselves, to receive another, and to become deeply intertwined with one another's lives.

And if relationship is the deepest structure of who we are, then there must be one relationship in which that structure is expressed more fully than anywhere else.

REVELATION FOUR

The Fullness of the Image

There is one relationship in creation that reflects the image of Hashem more completely than any other. The relationship between a man and a woman.

There is no other relationship that contains such an opportunity to give and to receive. To love and to be loved. To delight another and to be delighted. To bring another person pleasure and to receive pleasure from another. To honor and to be honored. To cherish and to be cherished. To protect and to feel protected. To comfort and to be comforted. To understand and to be understood. To reveal oneself completely, and to be completely received.

To share hopes, dreams, fears, burdens and victories. To build one home. One future. One mission. One life.

Little by little, two separate lives become woven together. Her joys become his. His struggles become hers. Her dreams become his dreams. His future becomes her future. Until they are no longer simply living beside one another — they are living one shared life.

Every form of giving. Every form of receiving. Every form of serving. Every form of caring. Every form of delighting another. Every form of allowing another to delight you. Every form of trust. Every form of vulnerability. Every form of partnership. All of it finds its fullest human expression here.

But even that is not the end.

Hashem designed this relationship so that their unity would not remain only emotional. Or intellectual. Or spiritual. It would become physical. Until the Torah could say:

וְהָיוּ לְבָשָׁר אֶחָד

“And they shall become one flesh.”

Now ask yourself: doesn't that sound familiar?

Hashem has been revealing this pattern from the very beginning.

This is why, when Hashem wanted to describe His relationship with His people, He didn't describe it as a king and his subjects. Or as a teacher and his students. He described it through the love between a man and a woman.

Shir HaShirim is not merely a love poem. It is the deepest description of the relationship between Hashem and His people — expressed through the language of a man and a woman in love.

And this is why, at the holiest place on earth, above the Aron, where the Torah itself rested, stood the Keruvim. Our Sages describe them as a male and a female embracing one another. Why? Because there is no relationship that more completely reflects the relationship Hashem desires with us.

And then comes something astonishing.

Hashem did not merely give us commandments. Or information. He gave us His Torah. His wisdom. His will. His vision. His inner world.

Torah is not merely something we learn. It is something we receive. Hashem gives something of Himself, so that His thoughts can become our thoughts. His desires can become our desires. His mission can become our mission. He gives Himself, to be received within us.

That is why Torah is so much more than information. It is communion. It is relationship. It is יְחִידָה. Not simply standing beside another, but allowing another to enter your inner world.

And Hashem wrote that very pattern into our bodies.

The relationship between man and woman does not end with shared dreams, shared emotions, or even shared lives. A man longs to give something of his very essence. His זֶרַע.

Not merely to create a child — that is one beautiful consequence. But the meaning is deeper. וְרָע is the physical expression of the desire to give oneself completely. To enter the life of another. To be received not only emotionally, but physically.

Just as Hashem gives us His Torah, His wisdom, His will, to live within us, a man longs to give something of himself to the woman he loves. And she longs to receive him. Not merely to stand beside him, but to receive his gift — his seed, which encapsulates his essence, his life, everything he is. Until the Torah can truly say $\text{וַהֲרִי לְבֶשֶׁר אָחָד}$.

This is the complete movement: from giving, to receiving, to sharing, to delighting, to being delighted, to becoming intertwined, until two become one.

And this is why this relationship contains the greatest capacity for human satisfaction. Because nowhere else do we become such a complete expression of אֱלֹהִים . Nowhere else do so many Divine qualities find expression at the same time. Nowhere else do we give so completely. Receive so completely. Love so completely. Delight another so completely. Allow ourselves to be delighted so completely. Become one so completely.

And there is something even deeper.

Every true act of וְחִיד brings creation one step closer to its ultimate purpose. The purpose of creation is that Hashem should give us the greatest possible pleasure. That pleasure is found in experiencing Him. And וְחִיד is the pathway through which that experience becomes possible.

Every experience of genuine oneness therefore carries within it a tiny reflection of the ultimate pleasure for which creation was made. A faint taste of experiencing Hashem Himself.

That is why this relationship contains such extraordinary joy and pleasure. Not because pleasure was added to persuade us to reproduce. Pleasure belongs here because this relationship most fully reflects the deepest structure of creation itself — a creation that was brought into being in order to give pleasure to His creations.

But wherever there is the greatest potential, there is also the greatest vulnerability.

Nowhere else can we feel so cherished. And nowhere else can we feel so rejected. Nowhere else can we experience such deep acceptance. And nowhere else such devastating loneliness.

Sexual frustration. Rejection. Betrayal. Divorce. The feeling of not being wanted. Of not being received. Of giving yourself and not being welcomed.

All of these wounds hurt so profoundly because they are not merely frustrating a physical desire. They touch the deepest desires for which we were created. The desire to give ourselves.

To receive another. To delight another. To be delighted. To become one. And ultimately, to experience — through that oneness — the One in whose image we were made.

FIVE

Now We Listen

My dear brothers and sisters.

For the last while, the Torah has been reminding us who we really are. Not who shame told us we are. Not who fear told us we are. Not who our failures told us we are. But who Hashem says we are.

Beings created בְּצֶלֶם אֱלֹהִים. Beings whose deepest desires were designed by Him. Beings created to give, to receive, to become one, and ultimately to experience Him.

At the start, I asked you to trust me. I asked you to hold off judging your desires until the Torah had a chance to remind you who you really are.

Now we're finally here. Now it's time to listen.

TRY THIS NOW — SLOWLY

Bring to your mind some part of the physical relationship between a man and a woman that you deeply desire.

It may be something outside the bedroom. It may be something inside the bedroom. Go to the places where the desire is strongest. And if you are truly brave, go to the places that have brought you the greatest shame — the desires that have confused you, that have embarrassed you, that perhaps have caused you to do things you deeply regret.

Now look at those desires again. Not through the eyes of shame, but through the eyes of your צֶלֶם אֱלֹקִים. Trust that what you are looking at contains something beautiful.

*Now simply listen. Ask your heart one question. Why?

Why is this so important to me? What am I hoping this will give me? What is my heart really longing for?

And then — don't answer. Listen.

When you discover the beautiful need hidden beneath the desire, and you begin to see yourself through Hashem's eyes, write it down. Not the behavior. Not the fantasy. Not the shame. The beautiful desire that Hashem placed within your heart.

SIX

From the Shame of Adam to the בְּרִית of Avraham

My dear friends, we have just been on an extraordinary journey.

It is a journey that began with Adam and Chava, standing in Gan Eden, covering themselves. Ashamed of their bodies. Ashamed of their desires. Believing that within them lay the potential for something ugly. For something wrong. For desires that were somehow separate from Hashem.

But then the Torah took us on another journey. The journey of the בְּרִית. The journey of Avraham Avinu.

Hashem commanded Avraham to remove the עֶרְלָה. Not because sexuality was the problem. But because something was preventing it from becoming what it was created to be.

The עֶרְלָה was the barrier. The barrier between Avraham and Sarah. The barrier that prevented their relationship from becoming a complete expression of the בְּרִית.

Hashem wasn't removing his sexuality. He was removing what stood in the way of יְחִיד. He was revealing the holiness that had been hidden there all along. The ability to become one.

And this is why, at the very end of Avraham's life, when he sent Eliezer to find a wife for Yitzchak, he said:

שִׁים נָא יָדְךָ תַּחַת יִרְכִי

"Place your hand beneath my thigh."

Why there? Because Eliezer had to swear upon the holiest object Avraham possessed — and for Avraham, that was the place of his bris milah.

Think about that. How could Avraham do such a thing? Why wasn't he embarrassed, like Adam?

The Or HaChaim HaKadosh explains: because Avraham no longer saw a place of shame. He saw the place through which he had spent his entire life expressing his צְלָם אֱלֹקִים. The place through which he had loved Sarah. Given himself. Entered into covenant. Brought holiness into the world.

Because Avraham no longer looked at his body through the eyes of Adam. He looked at it through the eyes of the בְּרִית. There was no embarrassment. Only holiness.

My dear friends, that is the journey we have begun here. From the shame of Adam to the covenant of Avraham. From hiding to revealing. From believing our desires are ugly, to discovering that beneath the confusion, beneath the pain, beneath the mistakes, Hashem placed something beautiful.

SEVEN

The Answer

We have now reached the point where we can finally answer the question with which we began.

Why do genuinely good people keep reaching for things they themselves believe are wrong?

Now we know.

Not because their desires are ugly. Not because they're weak. Not because they don't love Hashem. But because their hearts are genuinely hungry.

Hungry to love. Hungry to be loved. Hungry to give themselves. Hungry to be received. Hungry to become the people Hashem created them to be.

Every one of those actions promises to satisfy one of those beautiful needs. If it didn't, it would have no pull. Real falsehood never stands on its own. It survives only because it contains a piece of truth.

Every temptation whispers: “Do this, and you’ll finally receive what your heart has always longed for.”

Sometimes, for a few moments, it even feels true. But afterwards, the hunger remains. Because the need was never actually fulfilled.

The desire was never lying. Only the solution was.

And because the need is completely real, it continues to call us. Again. And again. And again. Not because we’re bad — because our deepest needs are at stake.

So the real question is no longer “How do I stop wanting?”

The real question is: “How do I actually fulfill these beautiful needs?”

EIGHT

How Do I Actually Live This?

If what we’ve discovered here is true, then the question naturally becomes: how do I actually live this?

That has been my life’s work.

For more than twenty years I have had the privilege of walking that journey with people. As a Rav. As an educator. And as a therapist. Helping them transform these beautiful desires from a source of confusion into a source of life.

For more than twenty years I have been asking myself one question. If this is true, how do we actually live it?

Over the years, that search became a simple path. Everything we have discovered here becomes practical through five stages:

Each stage builds upon the one before it.

For many years I walked this path with people through private sessions, and I continue to do that today. But about nine years ago I began experimenting with something different. Instead of walking this journey one person at a time, I invited a small group of men to walk it together.

And something happened that even surprised me. People realized they were not alone. They grew through one another's courage. One another's struggles. One another's victories. One another's insights. In ways that simply weren't possible alone.

That is why I don't offer a large anonymous course. I invite people into a small Chaburah — small enough that every person can be known, can be heard, can be challenged, and can grow. Over five weeks we walk this path together, learning not just to understand our desires, but to live them.

If many people join, we simply open another Chaburah. What matters to me is not the number. It's preserving the honesty, the relationships and the depth that make this work so transformative.

My hope is that when you put this down, you'll never again ask yourself “Why am I so broken?” Instead, I hope you'll begin asking: “What beautiful thing is my heart trying to accomplish?”

Because that question has the power to change everything.

Continuing the Journey

Private sessions

If you feel that individual guidance is the path that would serve you best, I would be honoured to walk that journey with you. Click Book a Personal Session on the website.

The Chaburah

If you would like to join the next Chaburah, click Join the Next Chaburah on the website.

For women

On the front page of the website, look for Women's Holy Femininity. Click there and you will find the information.

For couples

On the front page you will also find Or HaYichud: An Advanced Intimacy Course for Committed Couples. Because once we understand our own hearts, the next question becomes: how do two people actually build intimacy together?

TO BE IN TOUCH

EMAIL Yisrael@YisraelFrenkel.com

WHATSAPP +972 58-761-3153

WEBSITE Yisraelfrenkel.com

Thank you for reading.

Rav Yisrael Frenkel

YISRAEL FRENKEL